A bargain!

ONLY ONCE BEFORE had Red Roan been captured—and that was after the great wild stallion had been mauled by a bear, and was unable to flee to safety!

This time, Red Roan had been cunningly trapped, driven into a cul-de-sac by a party of determined wild horse hunters. It had taken the hard-riding cowboys more than an hour after that to round him up in a pocket of the arroyo—and after that many fruitless efforts before they finally put their ropes on him. At last, however, the scarlet stallion was a prisoner . . . held by half a dozen taut lariats . . . his ears flattened back, his eyes rolling wildly.

"What do yuh plan to do with the roan?" a grizzled cowboy asked Sledge Marsden.

The big rodeo owner slowly rolled a cigarette, his eyes considering the wild horse king. His powerful fingers rubbed his cleft jaw before he replied.

"I'm taking him along on the rodeo circuit," Marsden answered. "Folks everywhere have heard of this horse, Red Roan, king of the wild broncs. They'll come out in droves to see him—and to ride him!"

"To ride him?" the cowboy muttered. "But he's as ornery as nitroglycerine! He won't let yuh near him!"

"That's right!" Sledge Marsden agreed. "So I'll be safe in putting up a $500 reward . . . to the rider that can stick with him! Folks'll show up from fifty miles around to see what happens. Red Roan'll be a sensation! I'll call him The Rodeo Terror!"

That was the way it started.

Marsden joined his rodeo at Butte City, with Red Roan hobbled in a trailer. At Butte City, he put up huge display posters advertising $500 for the man who could ride his new horse, The Rodeo Terror! A big crowd turned out the first afternoon. When the first rider to drop from the chute onto Red Roan got bucked off in three seconds, they roared thunderously!

"Worse than a cage o' wildcats!"

"Nobody'll stick on that big red hoss!"

For the remainder of the Butte City show, the Marsden Rodeo played to a full house every day! But what the customers came to see was the new red bucking bronc—The Rodeo Terror—that no man could ride!

When the rodeo hit Lamar, and Prairie and Indiantown, crowds lined the street for the rodeo parade. When it came time for the local riders to challenge Marsden's prize bucking horse, the excitement grew. But always the story was the same.

No rider could stay on Red Roan for the required ten seconds.

For, coupled with his natural fury and strength, his speed and agility, Red Roan had now learned cunning. When he found riders dropping down on him who had legs of steel, who seemed to stick to him like glue, the wild horse learned new tricks to buck them off. He learned to sunfish, to hump his back so it seemed to form an upside-down V, to slam furiously against the board fences of the rodeo arena, even to fling himself on the ground so that the frightened rider would be forced to jump clear!

Along with these tricks, the scarlet stallion learned hatred for the first time.

He hated the spurring, hard-handed stubborn riders who were determined to stay on him—and whom he bucked off every time. But more than them, he detested big Sledge Marsden, the man who held him captive. He saw Marsden's cruelty toward the rodeo stock, watched him beat other animals, and cheat other men.

Whenever Marsden came near him, Red Roan reared back, hoofs ready to lash out. The two respected and feared each other.

ONE DAY, the rodeo came to the town of Larrabie.

After the parade, Red Roan munched oats in his stall. Suddenly, he seemed to scent something familiar. It was a man-smell, but it was not hateful! The stallion's nostrils searched the air, and his great dark eyes looked through the fence rails.

There, talking to Sledge Marsden, was another man. Suddenly, Red Roan recognized him.

It was Rob Raeburn, the man who had taken the roan horse to his ranch months before when Red Roan had been crippled by the bear. He was the only human who had ever made friends with Red Roan—and who had finally released him. Red Roan whinnied softly, and his ears strained for the sound of his friend's voice.

"Marsden, I've come to collect," Raeburn was saying. "You've owed me that feed bill for the last year and I need the money now!"

Husky Marsden grinned stonily.

"Five hundred dollars, you say, eh, Raeburn?" He shook his head. "But I alwa's did business with you for cash! Paid you off right on the spot! I don't owe you a cent. Or leastways, you can't prove that I do!"

IT was true, Rob Raeburn reflected bitterly. He had trusted Marsden when he had supplied him with feed for his stock. He had listened to the rodeo man's plea of being unable to pay and he had not demanded any security or I.O.U.'s. Now Sledge was pretending that he owed him nothing and was refusing to pay! He clenched his fists.

But, standing a good-half head over Rob, Marsden slipped his hand toward the Colt slung at his hip. He smiled slit-eyed at the rancher. Raeburn realized that it was no use. By picking a fight with the unscrupulous rodeo man he would only get in trouble with the law . . . or worse!

Then, for the first time, he saw Red Roan standing in his stall, watching him He heard the horse's low whinny. At that moment, he recognized Red Roan

He turned back to Sledge Marsden, and indicated the scarlet stallion with his thumb.

"Is that your Rodeo Terror?" he asked "The one we've been hearing so much about?"

"He's the one," Marsden said "I'm paying $500 to the first man to ride him ten seconds. But nobody's done it so far Why? Do you want your neck broken? Everyone's free to take a crack at riding him!"

"I'm not much on riding wild broncs," Rob Raeburn said slowly. "But . . maybe I'll take a chance . . . just this once . . ."

IT WAS THE MORNING of the big Larrabie rodeo. A huge crowd had swarmed to the arena. They came for the trick-riding, the calf-roping, the clowns, the wild-bull-riding, but mostly they came to see the Rodeo Terror, the horse that no man could ride.

Contestant after contestant came up against the big red horse, and was flung sprawling to the arena turf. Shouting and catcalling, Larrabie had seen nothing like it!

Then, the last volunteer stepped up to the chutes.

It was slight, wiry, Rob Raeburn.

Scowling, Sledge Marsden leaned over the corral fence. "Going to take a try at him after all?" he shouted. "I'm warning you, Raeburn, he'll snap you in half like a twig!"

The slender rancher smiled. He climbed to the top of the chute, saw the heaving, sweat-streaked body of Red Roan waiting beneath him. "Maybe he will," he said, "and maybe he won't." Carefully, speaking soothingly, his hand patting the roan horse's neck, Rob let himself down on Red Roan.

At once, whacking the stallion's rump with his rope, Sledge Marsden flung open the arena gate.

Out came Red Roan in a mighty lunge! The crowd roared. Then it suddenly grew still. For Red, Roan had remembered. This man, the man on his back, was the only friend Red Roan ever had—the only human he had ever trusted! Trembling, ears still back, Red Roan stopped bucking, skidded to a gentle walk, and then stood still in the center of the arena.

The seconds ticked away as the crowd watched in amazement.

From the fence, Sledge Marsden shouted furiously, "Buck, blast yuh! BUCK!"

But Red Roan stood stock still. In a few moments, the buzzer sounded, and the crowd roared tumultuously. For, however it had happened, Rob Raeburn was the first man to have stayed on The Rodeo Terror for ten seconds—and he won a prize of $500 They cheered uproariously as the scowling Marsden paid the young rancher off in the center of the arena.

SLEDGE MARSDEN never knew just how it happened. Nor did he ever exactly know how Red Roan escaped that night. He was sure that he had locked the scarlet stallion up securely in his stall. But, when morning came, the gate hung open, and Red Roan had disappeared. His tracks led straight toward the desert sand, toward the hills where his wild horse herd waited.

No one else ever knew how the great horse had escaped. No one, that is, unless you include the stallion himself—or a certain young rancher whose initials were the same as Red Roan's.

To Rob Raeburn — "A bargain was a bargain!"
